Chapter 5, La Psicologia Juridica Fiorelli, Mangini e.1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a combustion-engined vehicle and, more particularly, to a combustion-engined vehicle including a power generation device that employs the combustion of fuel. 2. Description of Related Art Air pollution caused by exhaust emissions has become a social problem in recent years. Therefore, there is a growing need for electric vehicles which do not generate exhaust emissions. On the other hand, the use of alternative energy capable of producing less exhaust emissions is also under consideration. Thus, although demand for fossil fuel-powered vehicles is expected to rise in the future, it is necessary to develop alternative energy engines to replace the existing engines that use such fossil fuel. When fossil fuel is combusted, for example, in the form of gasoline or diesel, the exhaust gas is mainly composed of carbon dioxide, nitrogen oxide (NOx), carbon monoxide, water, and hydrocarbon (HC). It is known that these substances in the exhaust gas discharged from an engine are highly harmful to human bodies. In addition, since fossil fuels are finite resources, the exhaustion of them is inevitable. Therefore, an ideal alternative energy engine should employ a clean energy source, such as the wind, solar light, tidal energy, geothermal energy, atomic energy, or nuclear energy. However, the clean energy sources mentioned above have various drawbacks. For example, when the wind blows, it is difficult to maintain a constant output, so that the maximum efficiency is low. An engine that employs the combustion of fuel in the air is called a combustion-engined vehicle. Fuel in the 3e33713323
