For example, local governments could combine educational and assessment programs to ensure that all their residents receive a free high school diploma. While it is not easy to regulate and supervise civic programs to guarantee that the services are of high quality, that should be a top priority of any sensible governmental system. Democratizing education is a deceptively complex endeavor, but the benefits are many, while the failures are few. It is a way of fostering civic engagement, as well as economic activity and innovation. Therefore, it is perhaps the most constructive activity in our society, providing a broad road map for social engineers who are attempting to achieve the objective of using the state to assure that a majority of children in the country obtain a free high school diploma.
