I'm also attempting to use custom memory allocation using the operator new[] method, but I'm concerned about what happens when I call the vector::data() method. My worries are as follows: I assume that I will need to initialize the new[] called memory before using it, but how? I also assume that I won't be able to use the uninitialized memory in the vectors' data member. Does that mean that I will need to create a vector object (dummy test) and then copy the objects into the new[] location? If so, why and how could I implement this? Here is what I have so far: #include "stdafx.h" class SafeVector: public

Launchkit is a great tool for distributing iOS apps over the web. It works by allowing your users to generate an iTunes Connect-style URL that will redirect users to your server's install page. But is it compatible with iCloud? I can't seem to get it to redirect to the right location with the current version of Launchkit, and I'm wondering if anyone has been able to successfully use it in this way. A: Anyone have this problem? I'm having the same problem getting it to redirect to the App Store store link. I have my DNS configuration set up on the apple site, and run on my server as 127.0.0.1. Using the version of Launchkit that comes with the download. It was working just fine a week ago, now it's giving me the 500 Internal Server Error. A: I'm pretty sure that Launchkit only supports manual redirections. I don't know of a way to support automatically generated ones. I suspect you're looking at something that the other iOS developers use. I just use iTunesConnect directly. Q: How to optimize AngularJS for server side script with ExpressJS? I am migrating an application from the KnockoutJS solution to the AngularJS one. The application has a Server
