Nerve growth factor, a neurotrophic factor for rat dorsal root ganglion neurons in culture, supports the survival and enhances the regeneration of transected rat sciatic nerve. The ability of nerve growth factor to provide neurotrophic support for degenerating dorsal root ganglion (DRG) neurons was examined in vitro. The DRG neurons of 7-day-old rats were cultured in a serum-free medium. When the neurons were exposed to nerve growth factor, 57% of the neurons had regrown axons after 4 weeks, while untreated neurons degenerated. The survival and regrowth of the DRG neurons were strongly correlated with the initial concentration of the nerve growth factor. When the young neurons were allowed to recover from the initial death in the presence of the factor, axonal regrowth was more rapid. Furthermore, the ability of the nerve growth factor to promote neurite outgrowth from the DRG neurons was increased by chronic treatment with NGF. Thus, nerve growth factor can support the survival of DRG neurons and enhance the regeneration of axons transected in the growth-inhibiting environment of a peripheral nerve stump. (1) Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a microcomputer having a plurality of function units, each of which has a built-in ROM, and more particularly to a microcomputer having a plurality of function units for controlling input/output interfaces, each of which has a ROM mounted on the same substrate, and a program memory. (2) Description of the Prior Art One example of conventional memory control apparatus is illustrated in FIG. 1. In FIG. 1, an address
