Snails are a delicacy in French cuisine. Japanese take them seriously. And New Yorkers do too! Perhaps you have shucked your first clams in a clam bake or steamed shrimp with green onions in Haarlem, or savored your first albondigas de manteca de cerdo in Washington Square Park in Manhattan. But perhaps the best way to enjoy these earthy treats is here at home! I decided to bring the flavors of the French countryside to my kitchen. I wanted to make an unusual recipe to share with you, a recipe by my friend Manuela Magri of "Crockpot Peas," which I found in this great, and quite in-depth, article by Marcel Vigneron. The recipes suggests serving the dish on pampered recliners, but I had to admit I had no one to share my dinner with. So, I took a cue from Marcel and made a dish to suit my current circumstances. Looking for a light entree on a cold, rainy day? This creamy recipe will do the trick. You'll love it! A New Way to Make Gastropub Food at Home - Crockpot Peas If you're living a healthy life, then perhaps you're really missing the feel of eating food like this! Forget about your poor, tastebud-deprived relatives who sit down at the kitchen table and scarf down pasta Bolognese and meatballs. If you want to have fun, enjoy some great food, and be part of a great moment with your loved ones, here's what you do. Visit your local Le Pigeon company and ask for their cookbook. This is where I found this amazing, no-nonsense, recipe. Enjoy!

Ingredients 1 lb frozen shelled green peas 2
tbsp butter 1 small onion, finely chopped
