Download the latest English film full versions. "Terminator 2: Judgment Day" .It's official. Build-A-Bear released a statement this morning that it will be closing by the end of the year. Kids could be out of a job as of Sunday, February 20th. The statement didn't mention whether there are plans to move the company's current location in Westfield, Indiana to the Twin Cities area. UPDATE: Build-A-Bear announced on Facebook this morning that they're hiring more than 500 new employees before the end of 2013. While the date is still in doubt, any day now we could start hearing news of some way for people to keep their existing Bear. My personal favorite is the "Elaborate Bear" or "Babes in Town". A grand-scale model of a Bear that they build in your own home, dressed up to your own particular specifications (such as adding a Sesame Street character head) and shipped to your front door. Essentially, you'd be in direct competition with Hobby Lobby, which just did a multimillion-dollar acquisition of The RealReal, a company that stocks and ships miniature versions of real items like houses and cars. Personally, I think the best solution is to move the company's current location to the Twin Cities. It's a much more predictable employment situation. However, that's also a move that would probably mean a whole new set of leadership, and it isn't as easy as just moving the company. The company itself hasn't even announced yet what their plans for move might be, but if all they need is more employees, the easiest way for them to scale their company is to hire more people. According to their Facebook post, they're already looking for experienced people with a passion for retail and for making other people's wishes come true, with no mention of needing to move or change the company's leadership. My best guess is that, if they do move, it will probably be to their existing headquarters in Westfield, Indiana where they could stay in the area. They could use the existing plants, offices and all the equipment there. Then, once they get their new people in place, they
