About the Engine: I have built the game on top of unreal engine, and it works on windows as well as linux. I also have created some scripts to help ease the development and also make the coding faster. Here is a demo of Deceased that I made: A: What you are doing is great, and I think that the "free" aspect of your game is why people like to play it. In some ways, this goes a little against my personal beliefs and preferences, but I understand the logic. Regarding the engine,

I can definitely recommend this engine to any indie developers. There are a lot of tutorials on the Unreal website for beginners and other related stuff. It is definitely one of the best free engines out there that you can use to do what you want to. They also have an official demo that you can download. Regarding your question, one of the best ways to enter the indie development community is to help others in making successful games. In order to do so, you can look for a

Sinking Island is an island with a history of shipwrecks and shipwrecks well being that dates back to pre-colonial times. The main island stretches over and is named by many sources as 'Wilson's Island', after James Wilson, a mariner. Others refer to it simply as "Sinking Island", or "Drowning Island", and its name has been listed as such by almost every source. The most popular local term is 'Dead Island', as it "submerged centuries ago" making it "thinly inhabited and dreary" or "pretty much deserted". Little is known about the island, as it only appears once on a British Admiralty chart in 1838. Until the development of the tourist industry, it was approached only rarely by sailors, who commonly saw it from a safe distance. It is thought to have been uninhabited, with no evidence to suggest that it was ever settled. The quality of the soil on Wilson's Island and the climate may have prevented the island's survival. More recent investigations by the Cedar tree Association of South Australia have revealed that Sinking Island is actually composed of two islands that were once joined at high tide. The larger of the two has probably stood for 100 years or more. Located to the south of Adelaide near the head of Spencer Gulf, Sinking Island is protected within the Sinking Island Nature Reserve. It lies entirely within the Goolwa and Murray Bridge local government areas. History Prehistoric and colonial Evidence of human habitation in the area can be traced back to a predynastic Mousterian site about 35,000 years old. This site has produced a large number of fossilised sea shells containing fish remains which can be dated to an age of paleolatitude [latitude 29° South] when the Great Antarctic landmass was present. These remains indicate that the area was visited by people from New Guinea as well as Australia. In contrast, the pre-European presence of humans cannot be confirmed north of Sinking Island, as the records are insufficient to determine the age of known pre-Adenese rock shelters or even the age of the oldest truly confirmed child, about 120 years old. However, the absence of any recognisable shipwreck or trace of human occupation on any of the islands in Spencer Gulf has to date, confirmed that Sinking Island was unpopulated. There is one credible report of a shipwreck on the island in 1835. The first
