In the past, many processes have been proposed for the production of swollen starch-containing granules (including, for example, U.S. Pat. No. 3,923,822, U.S. Pat. No. 4,205,090, U.S. Pat. No. 4,654,209 and U.S. Pat. No. 4,711,767). These processes generally involve extruding a starch slurry through a die to form an extrudate, which is heated to remove water and any fluid in the extrudate, and dried. The dried extrudate is then simply cooled to cause swelling. Despite such techniques, it has been found that to achieve any of the advantageous attributes of the present invention, the cooling must be carried out in a manner that is not compatible with some of the basic starch characteristics that must be maintained, as well as with the other manufacturing techniques employed. Specifically, in most applications it is desirable to carry out the cooling operation gradually so that the product does not experience any substantial shock during the cooling operation. However, as mentioned above, the cooling must be performed rapidly enough to cause the production of a starch product that is capable of being converted to a foamed product in a short period of time. Thus, the cooling must be more of a gradual process, which is only capable of being carried out over a short period of time. It has been found that the above problems may be overcome by simply extruding a starch slurry in accordance with the present invention and then cooling the resulting extrudate to a temperature that is near the gelatinization temperature of the starch, and in particular near the point where the starch granules become mobile within the extrudate, whereby the starch granules are caused to swell. Such process has been found to produce a starch product that has a number of good attributes, including that the products are capable of being fed into a foaming chamber where foaming is accomplished. In addition, such products are readily dispersible in aqueous media, so that they may be readily mixed with a wide variety of food products. Accordingly, it is a general object of the present invention to provide a process for the production of a foamed starch product. Another object of the present invention is to provide a e79caf774b

Prosecutors in Essex County say the company, based in Newark, made a so-called “detonator button” which causes the airbag to burst out of the dashboard in the event of a crash. The prosecutor’s office says that the company, H&B Armor Inc., sold more than 100 of the buttons in the past four years. Most of the buttons were sold in bundles of five for $78.70. A dozen were sold individually for $28. Prosecutors say the device is unsafe because it could cause bodily harm and harm to other drivers and passengers. Attorney Ed Johnstone says he doubts the company was targeting drunk drivers. H&B Armor’s Web site says it deals only with armored vehicles and armed security.(WBIR - September 15, 2018): Governor Steve Beshear recently signed a bill making Tennessee one of a handful of states to allow the sale and use of hemp products. According to the Governor’s Office, the new law allows both farmer-producers and retailers to sell the hemp products of their choice. Hemp’s next chapter. In the past few years, the state’s program has had limited success. The governor’s office says however, the bill finally includes farmers who could help fill Tennessee’s hemp supply. If passed, the law will be open to new farmers for the first time in nearly 20 years. The department of Agriculture and Consumer Services says they will accept applications from these farmers through the spring of 2019. Hemp farm owners are eligible to own up to 600 acres of land. Marketing and advertising for the product is still largely in question, but officials say right now, it will be up to individual farmers to decide. “As long as there are no negative health and safety concerns related to the crop or the product, then the consumer has the right to choose what they want to purchase,” said Oklahoma farmer Cyndi Hargis. Hargis is a hemp grower with Tennessee’s Department of Agriculture and Consumer Services. She says she expects the first crop to be ready to harvest in the fall.
