Effects of early haemodilution on the microcirculation and its clinical implication. The effects of haemodilution on systemic haemodynamics, microcirculation and clinical status were studied in a prospective study of 40 patients admitted to the surgical ICU. Haemodilution was obtained by administering 6% hydroxyethyl starch to maintain a haematocrit of 25% or 20% (group 1 and group 2, respectively). The patients were monitored by use of the microcirculation indicator, the laser Doppler flux, and pressure-mapping techniques of the skin. They were also monitored clinically and the clinical scores were scored. The mean blood loss and the time of haemodilution were similar in both groups. Haemodilution was associated with a significant decrease of the microcirculation and an increase of the incidence of hypotension and a decrease of cardiac index in both groups. A significant increase of the clinical score was observed. We concluded that haemodilution is associated with marked changes in systemic haemodynamics and a decrease in the microcirculation.
